Much like coaching relationships, the frequency of contacts between a consultant and learner is typically high in the early stages, and lessened over time as the teacher becomes more proficient at acquiring and demonstrating strategy use in applied settings. This involves ensuring that the responsibility for delivering effective services and facilitating ongoing growth and development among practitioners is transferred from a formal trainer coach, consultant, group facilitator to individuals and groups of professionals within early childhood settings. Further research and investigation would be needed to determine how a whanaungatanga approach relates to the family-centred practices discussed in this review.

Activities should be included that enable children with different learning A literature review for the Ministry of Education Principles and practices in early intervention: For example, many parents living with severe mental illness will need support in learning parenting knowledge, attitudes, and practices, specifically in understanding normal child development and milestones and how to provide emotional support for their children.
