The Marine Corps staff received added prestige when the posts of adjutant and inspector, quartermaster, and paymaster were raised to the rank of colonel in Most of these hrevetted officers soon were able to obtain line promotion to their brevet rank due to the subsequent increase in the strength of the Marine Corps.

To fill the gap in the third pay grade, the first group of staff sergeants received Marines holding that rank were designated acting gunnery sergeants. By 2, the sergeant major and quartermaster sergeant each received ten dollars per month, while the drum major and fife major were granted the same pay as a sergeant, nine dollars.

By this change, the drummer and trumpeter at long last became known officially was full acknowledgement of the modern military picture, yet no Marine could sadly say that "things aren't like they were in the old Corps. Another logical step in keeping with the practices of the early days of the Corps was the appointment of a senior NCO to the staff of the Coiranandant.
