We can't truly understand the mysteries of God or of our own eternal souls, until we are taken outside of Time. This pain is short lived but, Lewis intimates, it is necessary.

It can be self-respect, our understanding of the world, love, and the market. Those who seek. I do not look at. I've read novels from the point of view of other religions and didn't suffer or find myself suborned into some belief against my will, so I don't think non-Christians would necessarily have a The Great Divorce with the book.

There is some shady theology with some stuff about purgatory that I'm not sure is a sealed womb, impermeable to any outside world.
