Our ability to recall the past is enhanced by keeping diaries, or having access to old home videos. There is also useful material from the behavioural economists on why we make dumb decisions on investment and cannot seem to get out quickly from a failing situation. Indeed, a mentality of positive thinking might, eventually, help direct the mind to thinking not only about how to improve one's own condition but why the rulers are so signally failing to assist in that process. It may be that this is just the normal condition of humanity - as applicable to all. However, it does only that: Sometimes this can have very bad results, even resulting in bankruptcy. Clever psychopaths have massive but superficial charm. This book really seems to be for beginners since the author didn't go very deep, a very good book, yet not a very bad one! It could be argued that people in the advanced Western societies are falling into three broad classes of person in any one particular situation.
